I object to the abolition of the North Sydney electorate – one of the oldest in the country, which is an important historical point, as is the fact it was the first electorate to have independent representation. This latter point speaks to the true democratic potential and fairness of the Australian system of government,

Abolition of North Sydney fails to account for the growing population of this electorate and perhaps it would make more sense for Bradfield to be incorporated into North Sydney.

North Sydney electorate has its own thriving business CBD which is the third largest in Australia. Bradfield is essentially residential. It also has a strong and thriving multicultural community that again manifests what Australia purports to pride itself.
